Discovery by the Prosecution in the United States

Christopher SLOBOGIN

INTRODUCTION ........................................................................................................................................ 2

I. THE CASE FOR NO PROSECUTION DISCOVERY ........................................................................... 4

II. NOTICE OF DEFENSE AND WITNESSES .................................................................................. 5
   A. Three Theories ................................................................................................................................ 5
      1. Accelerated Disclosure Analysis .................................................................................................. 6
      2. Balancing Analysis ....................................................................................................................... 8
      3. Waiver Analysis ........................................................................................................................... 9
   B. Application to Other Defenses ...................................................................................................... 10

III. STATEMENTS FROM WITNESSES ............................................................................................ 11
   A. Prosecution-Created Statements ................................................................................................. 11
   B. Defense-Created Statements ...................................................................................................... 12

IV. NAMES OF NON-WITNESSES .................................................................................................. 16
   A. Discovery of Identities .................................................................................................................. 16
   B. Prosecution Use of Non-Witnesses ............................................................................................. 17

V. TANGIBLE OBJECTS AND DOCUMENTS THAT PRE-EXIST THE CHARGE ....................... 19

CONCLUSION .......................................................................................................................................... 22

1 Professor, College of Law, University of Florida, Gainesville, Florida.
In R. v. Stinchcombe,¹ the Supreme Court of Canada held that when an accused is charged with an indictable offense, the Crown has a legal duty to disclose all relevant information, exculpatory and inculpatory, to the defense. Left undiscussed by the decision, and by Canadian decisional and statutory law generally, is the scope of discovery against the defense. A description and analysis of the American experience in this regard may be of interest to Canadian practitioners and academics.

Prior to the middle of this century, defense attorneys and prosecutors in the United States depended on preliminary hearings and informal exchanges to obtain information about the other side's investigative efforts. Since the adoption of Rule 16 in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, in 1946, the scope of discovery has expanded considerably, in an effort to eliminate surprise and improve the accuracy of the fact-finding process. All of the states have followed the federal lead and in many cases have gone far beyond it.

The law concerning defense discovery has been the most uniform.² The U.S. Supreme Court has held, as a constitutional matter, that information which has a "reasonable probability" of affecting the "result" of a case in the defense's favor must be disclosed to the defense, regardless of state law on the matter.³ This standard does not require, as Stinchcombe apparently does, that all relevant information be handed over to the defense.⁴ But a fair number of American jurisdictions provide by statute that the prosecution surrender any information deemed "material" to the defense, including evidence that the prosecution will use at trial as well as "exculpatory" information. Many statutes or rules are more specific. For instance, virtually every state and the federal courts provide by rule or statute that the defense is entitled to:

1. any statements by the defendant possessed by the prosecution;
2. the defendant's criminal record; and
3. documents, photographs, tangible objects and the results of physical and mental examinations and other tests that the prosecution intends to use against the defense.
Many jurisdictions also require the prosecution to give the defense any witness statements it possesses. At the same time, to prevent the defendant from intimidating witnesses or concocting testimony, many jurisdictions allow the prosecution to refrain from giving the defense the names and addresses of prosecution witnesses, or statements made by them, until the time of their testimony at trial.

Prosecution discovery of the defense's case, the topic of this paper, has also expanded considerably since 1946. Initially, in many jurisdictions the prosecution was entitled to information from the defense only if the defense first requested information from the prosecution (the so-called "reciprocity doctrine"), or when the defendant planned to raise certain types of defenses (for example, an alibi or insanity defense). But many jurisdictions now grant the prosecution an "independent" right to discovery well beyond these limited circumstances. As Professor Mosteller has documented, many states require, regardless of any discovery request by the defense:

1. a specification of all defenses the defendant will raise;
2. the names and addresses of all witnesses that the defendant intends to call at trial; and
3. all statements of defense witnesses, including memoranda of unsigned oral statements.\(^5\)

Some states also require the defense to create and give to the prosecution statements from witnesses if they don't already exist, and others require the defense to surrender any statements from government witnesses in its possession, whether or not it intends to use them for impeachment purposes.

In examining the various types of prosecution discovery extant in the United States, this paper makes frequent reference to American cases, but an effort is made to avoid importing the more parochial elements of American law into the discussion. Prosecution discovery of the following items is taken up:

1. notice of defenses and supporting witnesses;
2. statements of witnesses;
3. names of non-witnesses;
4. tangible and documentary evidence.

Before examining these issues, it is useful to discuss briefly whether the prosecution should be entitled to any type of discovery.

I. THE CASE FOR NO PROSECUTION DISCOVERY

The argument against any type of prosecution discovery proceeds from the premise that, in its contest with the defense, the prosecution has a significant advantage. The prosecution has entire police departments to assist in its investigation; the defense is fortunate to have any investigative resources outside the defense attorney. Furthermore, in the United States at least, the prosecution may subpoena witnesses and documents through the grand jury (and in some states need not even use the grand jury). The defense has no such power. Given these resources, the argument goes, the prosecution should be forced to make its case without any help from the defendant. If the state's case cannot stand on its own, it should not be brought.

One can add to this argument assertions about potential abuse of information discovered from the defense. If the prosecution learns of the defense's theory of the case prior to trial, it can manipulate its witnesses accordingly. If it learns the identity of defense witnesses, it can intimidate them. In short, adding to the state's power is not only unnecessary in itself, but increases the chances of abuse.
To the latter point, one might respond that the appropriate way of guarding against unethical and unlawful behavior by the prosecutor or police officials is direct sanctions on the offending party, not an absolute prohibition on discovery. If there is a fear that agents of the state will intimidate witnesses, the state could be barred from contacting them except through a deposition process, with defense counsel present.

The larger point is harder to contest, however. Does the state really need discovery from the defense, given its awesome resources? Perhaps, despite its investigative power, the state will occasionally be surprised by a defense witness or a defense argument. But in cases where unanticipated defense tactic will work significant unfairness, the prosecutor can move for and the court may grant a continuance. Most importantly, forcing the prosecution to rely on its own resources will help ensure that only credible charges are brought. The state will not be tempted to indict individuals on weak evidence in the hope that witnesses provided by the defense might provide further leads.

In short, a strong case can be made for maintaining the status quo in Canada, particularly since the prosecution does not seem to be hampered in any significant way by current practice (this assertion is made after talking to several judges at the annual Canadian Institute for the Administration of Justice conference). On the assumption, however, that formal rules permitting prosecution discovery will be considered, the following analysis of American law and practice is offered.

II. NOTICE OF DEFENSE AND WITNESSES

A. Three Theories

Under American law, any discussion of prosecution discovery must start with the Fifth Amendment, which states that "[n]o person [...] shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." One might argue that this language prohibits any prosecution discovery, because it may compel self-incriminating information from the defendant. But there are at least three possible justifications for concluding otherwise: (1) the accelerated disclosure rationale; (2) the balancing rationale; and (3) the waiver rationale. As developed below, the waiver theory is not coherent, and the accelerated disclosure rationale is overbroad. The balancing rationale, despite its vague contours, is the most sensible. These rationales are developed here in connection with prosecution discovery of the defendant's defenses and supporting witnesses, and are then applied throughout the remainder of this paper.

1. Accelerated Disclosure Analysis

The leading United States Supreme Court decision on discovery is Williams v. Florida. In this case the defendant claimed that a state statute that required the defendant to give notice of an alibi defense, and the witnesses who would support it, violated the Fifth Amendment. The Supreme Court rejected this argument, by a margin of 6-2 (Justice Blackmun not participating). According to the Court, the statute exerted no more compulsion to produce alibi evidence than does the need to use the alibi testimony to avoid conviction at trial itself, and "[n]othing in the Fifth Amendment privilege entitles a defendant as a matter of constitutional right to await the end of the State's case before announcing the nature of his defense, any more than it entitles him to await the jury's verdict on the State's case-in-chief before deciding or not to take the stand himself".

One might wonder why the Court did not simply hold that notice of an alibi defense and witnesses is not testimony "against" the defendant, but rather testimony for the defendant, which would mean that compelling it does not violate the language of the Fifth Amendment. Probably it did not because such disclosures can produce incriminating information. For instance, an alibi witness can help the prosecution establish that the defendant was in the vicinity of the crime at the time it happened (even though the witness may insist the defendant was not at the precise spot where the crime occurred). Or the witness might provide the government with information about other potential witnesses or crimes committed by the defendant. Finally, as occurred in Williams, pre-trial notice might help the prosecution gather evidence that can be used to impeach the alibi witnesses.

As Justice Black pointed out in dissent, all of these possible prosecution uses of alibi witnesses are more likely when the defendant must inform the prosecution of the alibi before, rather than during, trial. However the majority counteracted by noting that, if notice of the defense is not given prior to trial, the prosecution can always seek a continuance during which it can take the deposition of the alibi witness and find rebuttal evidence. The Court concluded, "if so utilizing a continuance is permissible under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, then surely the same result may be accomplished through pre-trial discovery, as it was here, avoiding the necessity of a disrupted trial".

Contrary to the Court's reasoning, there is a significant difference between a pre-trial notice requirement and a practice forcing the prosecution to rely on continuances: under the former regime, the defense is required to decide what its theory will be prior to seeing the prosecution's trial case and perhaps even prior to receiving the names and statements of the prosecution's witnesses (depending upon the jurisdiction's rules governing defense discovery). Thus, under a notice regime, the defense is in the position of disclosing potentially incriminating information that it may never have disclosed had there been no notice requirement. The only solution to this change-of-defense scenario is to prevent the prosecution from using any information it obtained through the now-irrelevant notice, but that solution would probably be impossible to implement; it requires identifying and then tracing the influence of any leads the prosecution obtained through the defense's alibi witnesses.

The Williams Court either disregarded or believed negligible the dilemma described above. As a result, it established what could be called the "accelerated disclosure" exception to the right to remain silent. Under this exception, the defense can be required to disclose prior to trial any information it would disclose during trial, without violating the Fifth Amendment. Although Williams itself was limited to approving notice of alibi statutes, its reasoning has been applied by lower courts to permit prosecution discovery of virtually any information the defense will use at trial (short of the defendant's own testimony), ranging from notice of other defenses to names and statements of defense witnesses and tangible evidence.\textsuperscript{9}

2. Balancing Analysis

A second way of explaining the result in \textit{Williams} which may be just as persuasive, if not more so, is as follows: even if notice of alibi statutes do compel potentially incriminating information, that compulsion is justified by the legitimate state need to avoid surprise at trial, and the inefficiency caused by the granting of a continuance. The Supreme Court did not rely on this rationale in \textit{Williams}, but in \textit{Estelle v. Smith},\textsuperscript{10} decided eleven years later, the Court seemed to endorse the idea in the context of psychiatric evaluations. There, the Court, noting several lower court decisions upholding state-requested evaluations of defendants who had raised insanity defenses, stated that "[w]hen a defendant asserts the insanity defense and introduces supporting psychiatric testimony, his silence may deprive the State of the only effective means it has of controverting his proof on an issue that he interjected into the case". With this language and its apparent acceptance of state-requested pre-trial evaluations of insanity, the Court seemed to countenance not only notice-of-insanity defense statutes (because how else would the state know to request an evaluation?), but also state compulsion of statements from the defendant. The ground for both conclusions appeared to be, in the words of another Supreme Court opinion on the Fifth Amendment,\textsuperscript{11} that a "fair state-individual balance" required them. In other words, the Fifth Amendment does not protect against compelled self-incrimination in this context (and when the defendant is asserting an alibi) because the state can demonstrate that presentation of its case could be significantly hampered, in an unfair manner, without access to the incriminating statements.

The difficulty with this analysis, of course, is measuring the strength of the state's need and deciding how to "balance" this need against any interest in secrecy the defendant may have. For present purposes, it is only being argued that the state's need for notice about alibi and insanity defenses and supporting witnesses outweighs the defendant's interest in remaining silent. How balancing works in other contexts will be explored at later points in this paper.

3. Waiver Analysis

A final way in which one could analyze Williams (and Estelle) is through waiver theory. That is, the defendant, by raising an alibi or insanity defense, waives the Fifth Amendment privilege. The problem with this approach is that such a waiver is not valid, at least under Supreme Court cases holding that a person cannot be forced to choose between two constitutional rights. If one assumes, contrary to the reasoning just advanced, that the defendant does have a right to remain silent about his defenses and the witnesses who will support them, a notice statute would make him choose between that constitutional right and his right to present a defense, guaranteed in the U.S. by the Sixth Amendment (which protects, inter alia, the right to effective assistance of counsel, the right to confront accusers and the right to present evidence). The better way to explain Williams and Estelle is by straightforwardly concluding, under the above-described balancing approach, that the defendant who wants to raise an alibi or insanity defense has no right to remain silent about that fact. Then the notice statutes do not force a choice between two constitutional rights.

The waiver notion also appears to underlie the popular reciprocity doctrine described in the introduction to this paper: the defense should be able to control its information until it waives that control by requesting information from the prosecution. But, again, it is hard to characterize as voluntary a defense decision to disclose information when the reason it does so is because it wants information from the prosecution. If one posits a defendant's right to remain silent about all aspects of his or her case, the defendant here is being forced to choose between that right and the right (recognized explicitly in Canada via Stinchcombe) to present an effective defense through discovery of the prosecution's case.
As indicated above, the better analysis is to discard waiver notions and examine the balance of interests in determining whether a right to remain silent exists in the first instance. On this view, the reciprocity idea makes little sense. If the rationale for discovery is the avoidance of surprise and the thorough preparation of adversaries, the prosecution should not be barred from obtaining information it needs simply because the defense decides it does not need anything from the prosecution. By the same token, the defense should not necessarily have to surrender information in its possession merely because it finds (as will almost always be the case) that the state, with its superior investigative resources, has evidence that it needs. As noted above, many American jurisdictions appear to have concluded that reciprocity notions should not drive discovery.

A more discerning analysis would do away with the reciprocity idea and the underlying waiver notion. The focus should not be on whether the defense has requested information, but rather on when, if ever, the defense can validly claim that the prosecution has no need for its information or should not have access to it regardless of need.

B. Application to Other Defenses

While waiver analysis is deficient, both accelerated disclosure and balancing analysis may support the conclusion that notice-of-alibi and notice-of-insanity defense statutes are constitutional. Assuming so, do these approaches also justify statutes which require notice of other defenses, such as self-defense or duress? As noted above, many lower courts have permitted any such statute, under the accelerated disclosure rationale. Under a balancing approach, on the other hand, one might argue that the state's need to know whether a defendant is going to assert these types of claims is not as strong as in alibi or insanity cases, since the latter two defenses are harder to anticipate and require more preparation to rebut. The prosecution will usually know from its own investigation whether most claims, that is, a self-defense or intoxication claim, might be made. Yet the fact remains that even these latter types of claims can be a surprise to the prosecution. Assuming that one does not endorse the argument advanced at the outset of this paper - that the prosecution is never entitled to defense information because of its mammoth resources - statutes which require notice of defenses and identification of witnesses who will support the defense's cases might well be supportable even under the latter theory.

A final question is whether the state can force the defendant to reveal prior to trial whether he is going to testify in support of a defense. Since the prosecution will find out the answer to this question at trial, the accelerated disclosure rationale once again suggests the information is discoverable. However, the balancing approach suggests another answer. As developed below, in contrast to what it may do with other witnesses, the state may not question a defendant about what he plans to say. Accordingly, one might argue, the value of notice as to whether the defendant will testify is minimal. Under a balancing approach, then, such notice would not be justifiable.14 In Brooks v. Tennessee,15 the Supreme Court may have suggested as much, although the opinion is subject to numerous interpretations.16

III. STATEMENTS FROM WITNESSES

A. Prosecution-Created Statements

Alluded to above is the rule that the government may not force the defendant, prior to trial, to divulge what he will say at trial (in those cases where he plans to testify). Because deposing the defendant prior to his testimony would be helpful for impeachment and avoidance-of-surprise purposes, one could easily argue that, even under a balancing rationale (and particularly under the accelerated disclosure exception), this rule is wrong. But the Supreme Court has clearly indicated that an accused has a right to remain silent prior to trial, even when he is represented by counsel and not in danger of being physically or psychologically coerced.17 The rationale for this rule, and for the language in the Fifth Amendment upon which it is based, is complex, and beyond the scope of this paper.18 The important point for present purposes is that the Fifth Amendment prevents discovery in this context.
However, as noted above, Estelle v. Smith does permit the state to force pre-trial disclosures from a defendant who is raising an insanity defense. Even assuming the Fifth Amendment should generally be construed to bar pre-trial interviews of the defendant by the state, an exception to this rule in the special context of insanity pleas makes some sense. Consider the following analogy: While the defendant can refuse to testify on Fifth Amendment grounds, most would agree that he should not be able to testify and then refuse to be cross-examined by the prosecution;\(^\text{19}\) in any event, the Supreme Court has so held, on the ground that allowing such a refusal would upset a "fair state-individual balance".\(^\text{20}\) Similarly, allowing the defendant claiming insanity to "testify" through his expert without being subjected to some inquiry by agents of the state would upset the state-individual balance; the defendant should not be permitted to avoid a pre-trial interview by the state in this situation.\(^\text{21}\) At the same time, balancing analysis suggests that the state should be permitted to use disclosures obtained during this interview only to address the issue presented by the defendant - the insanity defense - and not other issues.\(^\text{22}\)

While defendants may be interviewed prior to trial only under limited circumstances such as those noted in Estelle, other defense witnesses can be deposed any time the prosecution wishes to do so, once it has discovered who they are. The Fifth Amendment doesn't prohibit such interviews because, even if they are compelled, the compulsion is directed at the witness, not the defendant. Thus, in contrast to state attempts to depose the defendant, in this situation the defendant has no constitutionally recognized interest to range against the state's interest in obtaining information.

B. Defense-Created Statements

Under an accelerated disclosure rationale, prosecution discovery of statements the defense obtains from its own witnesses might depend upon the nature of the statements. If the statements merely anticipate testimony at trial, they would be discoverable. On the other hand, since those statements that are unfavorable to the defense will presumably not be presented by the defense at trial, the accelerated disclosure rationale might dictate that the prosecution should not have access to them. Most state statutes permitting prosecution discovery of witness statements do not differentiate between favorable and unfavorable parts of the statements, however.\textsuperscript{23} State courts addressing the constitutionality of such provisions have not made the distinction either.\textsuperscript{24}

Balancing analysis, on the other hand, might dictate that witness statements remain undiscoverable regardless of content. Under this analysis, one first asks whether the prosecution needs pre-trial discovery from the defense. When the item sought is a statement from a defense witness, the answer to this question will generally be no, for the simple reason that, as noted above, the prosecution can almost always obtain its own statement from the witness. One might respond by speculating that statements to defense attorneys will be more candid or accurate. But, in the typical case, there is no reason for a witness who is not a defendant to lie to the government (at least any more than he or she might lie to the defense); if the lie is perpetuated at trial, the witness will be even more likely to risk perjury charges if he or she has told one story to the defense and another to the prosecution. One might also respond by noting that it is inefficient to make the government interview a witness who has already been interviewed by the defense. Normally, however, any witness who is significant will be interviewed by both sides; in any event, the cost to the government of such interviews is normally minimal. In short, the only significant state interest behind a rule requiring defense disclosure of witness statements is that it occasionally gives the prosecution more information than it otherwise would have obtained through reasonable investigation.

It is unlikely this interest outweighs the inhibiting effect such a rule could routinely have on defense attorneys' desire to obtain such statements. For those who question whether such an inhibiting effect exists, one need merely point to the civil system, where a strong work product privilege has been recognized for some time, based on the premise that attorneys' investigations will otherwise be compromised. For instance, the federal rules prohibit discovery of documents prepared by attorneys in preparation for litigation unless the adversary can show a substantial need for them.\textsuperscript{25} A constitutionally-based argument in the same vein could be derived from the Sixth Amendment which, as noted above, guarantees the defendant the right to effective assistance of counsel. If the defense attorney knows witness statements will have to be turned over to the prosecution, he or she may be deterred from fully investigating the witness's story.

A balancing analysis would not necessarily deny the prosecution all access to statements from defense witnesses, however. For instance, analogous to the civil rule, if the prosecution could show a substantial need for such a statement (the witness has died, or refuses to talk to the prosecution) then it could be discovered. Instead of adopting this more sensitive approach, many states grant the prosecution automatic pre-trial access to defense witness statements. In some states, this stance results from application of the reciprocity doctrine, the irrelevance of which was discussed above. In other states, this position is not even limited by a defense request for information.

The "unfairness" of both approaches is exacerbated by the fact, noted at the beginning of this paper, that in many jurisdictions the prosecution can withhold statements of its witnesses until trial, whether or not it can show a concern about witness intimidation. A truly "reciprocal" approach would at least grant the defense the same control over its information. This approach, it is submitted, is the correct reading of United States v. Nobles, a case which has given commentators much difficulty. There, the defense attorney tried to impeach two eyewitnesses for the prosecution with references to a report prepared by his investigator containing descriptions of previous interviews with them; when the defense later called the investigator to the stand, the trial judge ruled that "if he testifies in any way about impeaching statements made by either of the two witnesses," then the government was entitled to look at those portions of the report that contained the alleged impeaching statements (to be excerpted from the report by the judge after an in camera review). When defense counsel refused to submit the report, the investigator was not allowed to testify. On appeal the defendant argued that the trial court's attempt to compel the disclosure of the report violated the privilege against self-incrimination, the Sixth Amendment right to produce evidence and confront accusers, the Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel, and the work product doctrine.
The Supreme Court rejected all of these arguments. The Fifth Amendment was not violated because the court order did not compel statements from the defendant, nor compel the defendant to reveal the identity of witnesses unknown to the prosecution. The confrontation and compulsory process clause arguments were rejected because "[t]he Sixth Amendment does not confer the right to present testimony free from the legitimate demands of the adversarial system; one cannot invoke the Sixth Amendment as a justification for presenting what might have been a half-truth". Similarly, to the defendant's argument that the trial court's approach would "inhibit" counsel's investigative efforts, the Court stated: "[t]he short answer is that the disclosure order resulted from [the defendant's] voluntary election to make testimonial use of his investigator's report". Finally, the Court held that "by electing to present the investigator as a witness, [the defendant] waived the [work product] privilege with respect to matters covered in his testimony".27

It might be argued, under an accelerated disclosure rationale, that since Nobles permits the prosecution to obtain unfavorable aspects of a witness' observations at trial, it should be able to obtain this information prior to trial. The better reading of Nobles, however, is to limit it to the trial context. Until the witness has actually told the "half-truth" - which is the situation in which the trial judge in Nobles contemplated giving the report to the prosecution - the state has no need for that witness' prior statements or observations (especially since it can interview the witness prior to trial). At the same time, such a rule ensures that the defense is not inhibited in its investigative efforts, which should be as wide-ranging as possible. Rather, under this reading of Nobles, what is inhibited are defense attempts to present witnesses without revealing their prior inconsistent statements, which is not justifiable under any analysis (except as to the defendant, who is protected by the Fifth Amendment and the attorney-client privilege).28

However, one comes out on the necessity of providing the prosecution with written or oral statements of defense witnesses, the provisions found in some states requiring the defense to create such statements when they have yet to be made seem insupportable. First, as developed further below, directing the defendant to manufacture such statements might run afoul of the Fifth Amendment's prohibition against compelling a defendant to testify against himself. Even if it does not, this latter type of provision is unjustifiable under a balancing approach. As explained above, giving the prosecution pre-existing statements could be justified, if only weakly so, on the ground that it increases the amount of information in the prosecution's possession, provides more accurate statements, and avoids duplication of effort. When the statements are created at the prosecution's request, however, none of these interests are furthered, given the fact that the prosecution can as easily take its own statements.

IV. NAMES OF NON-WITNESSES

Although the Supreme Court has required the prosecution to divulge exculpatory information, and many states further provide that the prosecution disclose any "material" information that might favor the defense, most jurisdictions do not impose a similar duty on the defense to provide the identities or statements of people it does not intend to use in its case. Such a stance is obviously supported by the accelerated disclosure rationale. It is also generally acceptable under balancing analysis but, as usual, the reasoning under this approach is more subtle, as the discussion below indicates.

A. Discovery of Identities

In Fisher v. United States, the Court held that the Fifth Amendment prevents the state not only from compelling self-incriminating admissions from the defendant, but also from compelling the defendant to disclose the existence of evidence against him. It further held that the attorney-client privilege prohibits compelling the defendant's attorney from surrendering such information. While the Fifth Amendment would not prevent the latter disclosure (because the amendment is concerned only with defendant-directed compulsion), the Court held that the attorney-client privilege does so, in order to avoid inhibiting discussions between attorney and client. Thus, the state cannot force the defendant or his attorney to disclose the identity of a non-witness (such as a co-perpetrator) whose existence is known because of the defendant. This result makes sense under a balancing rationale as well; although the state obviously would find the identity useful, granting discovery could easily lead to a situation in which even the defense attorney would not find out about it, since the defendant who is aware his attorney is a conduit to the prosecution will keep mum.

On the other hand, Fisher suggested, if the defense's knowledge about the existence of incriminating information does not come from the defendant, it is not protected by either the Fifth Amendment or the attorney-client privilege. Thus, if the defense's awareness of a non-witness is the result of the attorney's efforts (as is often the case with experts, for instance), his identity might be discoverable, at least as far as the Fifth Amendment is concerned. Under a balancing approach, however, the source of the defense's knowledge about a person's identity should not matter. In either case, allowing prosecution discovery will inhibit defense investigation; in the latter situation in particular, the attorney will be deterred from seeking experts and other sources of information, or at least experts and other sources who are likely to produce unfavorable information, if the prosecution must be told of every consultation. On this ground, some lower courts have held that the Sixth Amendment's guarantee of effective assistance of counsel protects against disclosure of non-witness identities. Another reason for this position, also related to the attorney effectiveness issue, is the damage to the attorney-client relationship that will occur if defendants see that their attorneys routinely hand over to the prosecution information which could prove damaging to the defendant's cause.

B. Prosecution Use of Non-Witnesses

Even though most jurisdictions do not require the defense to reveal the identity of non-witnesses, the prosecution frequently finds out who they are through means other than the discovery process. In such cases, the issue arises as to whether the prosecution may use the person as its own witness. Answering this question requires distinguishing between two different types of potential prosecution witnesses. When the person obtained his knowledge about the case from his own observation prior to initiation of the prosecution against the defendant (such as a co-perpetrator), the prosecution should be able to use him to full advantage. However, when the person has obtained his information only because the defendant has given it to him in the course of investigating or preparing the case, determining whether the prosecution should be able to use him as its own witness is more difficult.

This issue has been frequently litigated in the context of insanity cases. Many courts, relying on the Sixth Amendment's guarantee of effective counsel, the attorney-client privilege or both, have said that the state may not call psychiatric experts the defense has decided not to use. Others, concerned that this rule would allow the defendant to "gag" all the available experts, or simply desirous of providing the jury with all the facts, have held the opposite. A few courts have extended the reasoning found in the latter cases to statements obtained by other types of experts retained by the defense, (as polygraph experts), at least when sought for the purpose of impeaching a defendant who has taken the stand.

These latter decisions are highly questionable. If state discovery of unused defense experts' identities rarely occurred, and was accidental when it did occur, then state use of the experts' findings would probably be permissible under a balancing approach; defense attorneys, knowing they would control when the expert would testify in the vast majority of cases, would still seek expert assistance. But the number of cases raising the issue indicates that prosecutors have been very successful at finding out about unused experts. Perhaps the experts contact the prosecution or a defense expert who is being used refers to an unused expert, or perhaps the prosecution finds out the unused expert's name from the defense attorney's motion requesting court reimbursement for the evaluation. To the extent defense attorneys fear such discovery, they will once again be inhibited from consulting any expert who might give an unfavorable opinion.

As with other aspects of discovery, this conclusion does not mean that the prosecution can show that the expert possesses information to which it would normally be entitled, but for good reason was unable to obtain, then it probably should be allowed to use the expert. For instance, if a defendant raising an insanity defense does not fully cooperate with the state experts, or his interview with unused defense experts was much closer in time to the offense than the state's examination and thus more accurate in terms of data about mental state, the prosecution could perhaps rely on the unused experts. Or if a defense expert analyzed the blood type of a person whom the defendant claims committed the crime, but who has since disappeared, the expert's information should be discoverable. On the other hand, under the Fifth Amendment, the state is not entitled to conduct polygraph tests of the defendant or otherwise require him to talk; thus, statements made to a defense-retained polygraph operator or similar expert are legitimately withheld from the state, even if that means the prosecution will be prevented from obtaining useful impeachment evidence. Otherwise, vigorous defense investigation and the attorney-client relationship will be significantly undermined.

V. TANGIBLE OBJECTS AND DOCUMENTS THAT PRE-EXIST THE CHARGE

To the extent a tangible piece of evidence (for example, a document) is created by the defense during its investigation, its discoverability has already been discussed. Here the focus is on items that existed before the defendant is accused of a crime and the investigation has commenced (that is, clothing connected with the crime, business records). Every jurisdiction requires defense disclosure of such items when the defendant plans to use them at trial. Such provisions are clearly justifiable under the accelerated disclosure rationale. They are supportable under balancing analysis as well, because they provide the prosecution with information for which there is no other direct source. While the prosecution can interview witnesses (thus supporting the conclusion reached above that the defense need not hand over witness statements), the prosecution has no substitute for tangible items such as those involved in commission of the crime or business and personal records.

A harder question is whether the prosecution may discover tangible items and documents the defense will not use at trial (such as the murder weapon, incriminating business records). This issue again raises the familiar tension between state and defense objectives. On the one hand, the unreplicability of these items means that the prosecution's need for them is at least as great, and usually greater, than its need for items the defense will use at trial. On the other hand, allowing discovery of such items might inhibit defense investigation.

Precedent from the U.S. Supreme Court suggests that these items will often be discoverable, if not through statutory discovery provisions then through the subpoena process. In the aforementioned case of Fisher v. United States, as well as in other decisions, the Court has made it clear that the Fifth Amendment only protects against "testimony" that is "compelled" from the defendant. Tangible objects like a weapon are not "testimonial". And while documents are testimonial, when they pre-exist the prosecution's discovery request, as is the case here, their creation is not compelled. Thus, a subpoena for such items will often withstand a Fifth Amendment challenge.

The Court has made one significant caveat to this conclusion, however. As Fisher noted, the act of producing the item may be testimonial, in the sense that the defendant is admitting "this item is in my possession". If the fact the item is in the defendant's possession is an element of the prosecution's case, then forcing production of it will violate the Fifth Amendment. For example, if the prosecution requests the defendant to produce contraband, stolen goods or a murder weapon, the item itself is nontestimonial, but the act of producing the item is testimony to the effect that the defendant possesses it. Thus, the Fifth Amendment would bar such discovery, unless the prosecution could guarantee it would not use the testimony (that is, "immunize" the defendant against use of the act of production by promising not to reveal where the evidence came from); of course, in many cases involving non-documentary evidence, such as when the evidence is contraband or stolen, such immunization would render the discovery useless. On the other hand, the "testimony" that the defendant possesses given business documents or authenticates them as the business' is usually not crucial to the prosecution's case (or can be proven in some other way), so discovery in such situations is more likely to be permissible under the Fifth Amendment. 39
Using balancing analysis, one would probably conclude that prosecution discovery of tangible items would be much more limited than is currently the case under the Court's jurisprudence. In essence, the situation at issue here is no different from prosecution discovery of eyewitnesses about whom the defendant knows. As with the identity of potential eyewitnesses, allowing discovery of tangible items might lead the defendant to avoid disclosing their existence to the defense attorney, thus compromising attorney effectiveness. Furthermore, given its powers of search and seizure (regulated in the U.S. by the Fourth Amendment), the prosecution normally has a good chance of discovering tangible items on its own, perhaps an even better chance than it has of finding certain types of eyewitnesses (such as co-perpetrators). Thus, it should not be able to depend upon the defense for such evidence.

Admittedly, this approach would dramatically change American law with respect to subpoenas. Under current jurisprudence, a subpoena for documents and other tangible items may issue if it particularly describes the item sought; unlike the requirement when a search warrant is sought, the state need not show "probable cause" as to why it thinks the defendant has the item or as to where it thinks the item is. The above proposal would require the state to resort to the typical warrant procedure when the object of discovery is the defendant. It is based on the premise, which flows from balancing analysis, that the state should not be able to avoid the typical restrictions on searches just because the item sought is a document rather than drugs or weapons.

The one limited situation in which compelling the defendant to disclose unfavorable tangible items might be permissible under balancing analysis would be when the defendant has given the evidence (such as the murder weapon or documents) to the attorney for "safekeeping". In this case, the attorney clearly has had access to the evidence; moreover, prosecution access through the normal search and seizure process has been stymied. Even in this situation, however, the prosecution must be specific in its discovery request. In other words, the prosecution may not routinely ask the defense attorney to turn over all incriminating tangible evidence in his or her possession that existed before the latter's investigation began. Rather, it should have to demonstrate its need for the sought-after evidence by showing that the particular item probably exists, that it has not been found, and that it is in the possession of the attorney. Without such a showing, the prosecution has failed to demonstrate a significant enough state interest in discovery.\textsuperscript{45}

\textbf{CONCLUSION}

The rules governing prosecution discovery in the United States are summarized at the beginning of this paper. There follows a summary of rules that arguably are more consistent with American constitutional principles:

1. The prosecution should be able to discover any affirmative defenses the defense will raise at trial, as well as the identity of supporting witnesses (other than the defendant), sufficiently ahead of trial to interview the witnesses and otherwise prepare its response.

2. Prior to their testimony at trial, the prosecution should not be able to obtain statements made by defense witnesses to the defense, unless it can show a substantial need for them (for example, death or noncooperation of the witness).

3. The prosecution should not be able to obtain the identity of individuals the defense will not use as witnesses. If it discovers the identity of such a person through other means and that person knows about the case solely because of the defense's investigation (such as a psychiatric expert), it may use that person as a witness only if it can show he possesses information which is now inaccessible and to which the prosecution would have been entitled (such as the mental state of the defendant just after the offense).

4. The prosecution may discover tangible items (such as documents) that pre-existed the defense's investigation if: (a) they will be used by the defense at trial; or (b) the prosecution can convince a judge that they are in the defense attorney's possession. Other attempts to obtain such items should be regulated by the Fourth Amendment's warrant and probable cause requirements.
FOOTNOTES

4. See United States v. Bagley, supra note 3

5. R. Mosteller, "Discovery Against the Defense: Tilting the Adversarial Balance" (1986) 74 Cal. L. Rev. 1567 at 1570. This is the best single article on the issue. See also, E. Tomlinson, "Constitutional Limitations on Prosecutorial Discovery" (1986) 23 San Diego L. Rev. 993.

6. For a description of the grand jury subpoena power, see Whitebread & Slobogin, supra note 2 at S 23.05(a). In Florida, the prosecutor is authorized to issue subpoenas. Fla. Stat. S 914.04.

7. One colleague from New Jersey told me that, upon learning the identity of defense witnesses, law enforcement officials in that state have been known to "visit" the witness in an effort to deter testimony. Another has suggested that even "legitimate" attempts by the prosecution to follow up on defense discovery can be intimidating, merely because the witness, although perhaps telling the truth about the defendant, may in other ways be "operating on the edge of legality". Without such a visit, the witness would show up and state what he knows.

11. Murphy v. Waterfront Com'n of New York, 378 U.S. 52 (1964), stated:

    our sense of fair play [...] dictates 'a fair state-individual balance by requiring the government to leave the individual alone until good cause is shown for disturbing him and by requiring the government in its contest with the individual to shoulder the entire load ...'

13. Of course, if one disagrees with the conclusion that there is no right to remain silent about such matters, than the notice-of-alibi statute is deficient under waiver analysis, unless one concludes that the defendant can be forced to choose between two constitutional rights.

14. One colleague of mine has noted that, at least in multi-defendant cases, knowing which of the defendants will testify can be extremely helpful even if the precise content of the testimony is unknown, as preparing cross-examinations of all defendants can be extremely time-consuming. This burden seems minimal, however, compared to having to anticipate an alibi or insanity defense in every case.

16. In Brooks, the Court found unconstitutional a state statute requiring that, if the defendant chose to testify, he must do so at the beginning of his case, after the state rested. This decision could be read to mean that the state cannot force the defendant to reveal if he will testify prior to trial. Or it could merely recognize that the state cannot force particular trial tactics on the defendant.

17. Indeed in Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965), the Court held that the prosecutor may not even comment on the defendant's failure to talk.

19. Note that in some countries, such as Australia, a defendant can give "unsworn" testimony, in which he may make a statement, not under oath, without fear of cross-examination.

21. The counter-argument would be that the state does not need an interview with the defendant to combat the insanity defense; cross-examination of the defense expert and evidence from lay witnesses should be deemed sufficient.

23. See, for example, Fla.R.Crim.Pro. 3.220(d)(2)(i).

24. See Mosteller, supra note 5 at 1570.

25. Fed.R.Civ.Pro. 28 U.S.C. 548 26(b)(3). Admittedly, Rule 26(b)(4) permits a party to require answers to interrogatories about the facts and opinions of experts who will be used by the defense. But these answers are not statements or reports from the experts. The latter can only be discovered if substantial need is shown. This paper takes no position on whether, as provided by the civil rules, depositions of experts should be barred pending unsatisfactory answers to the interrogatories.

27. Note that waiver analysis is appropriate here, unlike in Williams, because the defendant clearly does not have a right to present "half-truths" through witnesses other than himself. He can be forced to choose between presenting a witness's full story and foregoing use of the witness altogether.

28. Note that, shortly after Nobles, the Supreme Court promulgated a new criminal rule requiring both the defendant and the government to produce the prior statements of their witnesses after each witness had testified. Fed.R.Crim.P. 26.2. Pre-trial disclosure of such statements is not addressed. Several lower courts have held that neither the work product doctrine nor the Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel prohibits forcing pre-trial disclosure of defense witness statements. Spears v. State, 647 Ind. 272, 403 N.E.2d 828 (1980); United States v. Felt, 502 F.Supp. 71 (D.D.C. 1980).

30. See, for example, State v. Williams, 80 N.J. 472, 404 A.2d 34 (1979).

31. See, for example, United States v. Alvarez, 519 F.2d 1036 (3d Cir. 1975).

34. See Jones v. Superior Court, 58 Cal.2d 56, 372 P.2d 919, 22 Cal. Rptr. 879 (1962), a leading case on discovery of defense experts.

35. The American Bar Association has recommended an interesting compromise in this situation: it would permit the prosecution to obtain its own evaluation within a short time of the defense's evaluation, but would seal the results of this evaluation until the defense gives notice of an intent to raise an insanity defense. Criminal Justice Mental Health Standards 7-3.4.

36. See, for example, Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966).

37. For obvious reasons, the prosecutor normally would not use a subpoena in this situation, but rather resort to a search, as discussed below. Nonetheless, this example helps clarify the theory behind the Fifth Amendment.
38. Not in all cases, however. For instance, a prosecutor who obtained a weapon from the defendant in this manner would not be able to state in court where it obtained the weapon, but would be able to present ballistics evidence that the weapon is the one used in the crime.

39. A third caveat to the notion that tangible items are discoverable may be that personal papers, as opposed to business records, can never be discovered, because they fall within an inviolate "zone of privacy". See generally, C. Whitebread & C. Slobogin, supra note 2 at §15.06.

40. Under the Fourth Amendment, American police are required to have warrants, based on probable cause, for many types of searches, but this requirement is usually not difficult to meet. Furthermore, there are many exceptions to the warrant requirement, to the extent that roughly 95% of all searches are conducted without a warrant. See generally, C. Whitebread & C. Slobogin, supra note 2 at §§ 4.02, 4.03, 4.05(d), 5.01 and 5.03. Subpoenas are minimally regulated by the Fourth Amendment as well, see note 41 infra, but are treated separately here for reasons which should become clear below.

41. The leading case is United States v. Gurule, 437 F.2d 239 (10th Cir. 1970); see also, United States v. R. Enterprises, Inc., 111 S.Ct. 722 (1991) (emphasizing that, under the federal rules, a subpoena is valid so long as it is not "too indefinite" or "overly burdensome").

42. When the source of information is a third party, the typical subpoena process could still be used.

43. As I have argued elsewhere, "probable cause" should be flexibly defined proportionate to the intrusion involved. C. Slobogin, "The World Without a Fourth Amendment" (1991) 39 U.C.L.A. L. Rev. 1. Thus, searches for business documents may not require as much in the way of "probable cause" as searches for more private papers. (Of course, the defendant may also hand over documents voluntarily in order to avoid more intrusive searches.)

44. Although the prosecution could seek a warrant to search an attorney's office, just as it would to search a defendant's home, courts would resist issuing the former type of warrant, given the large amount of confidential information, most of it irrelevant to the defendant's case, that might be exposed by such a search. M.D. Stern & D. Hoffman, "Privileged Informers: The Attorney Subpoena Problem and a Proposal for Reform" (1988) 136 U.Pa. L. Rev. 1783.

45. It should be noted that, in some jurisdictions, the attorney may be ethically compelled to hand over evidence in such situations. See State v. Olwell, 64 Wash. 2d 828, 394 P.2d 681 (1964).